

Khan, Hamid M.

Hamid M. Khan is Deputy Director of the Rule of Law Collaborative and an Adjunct Professor at the University of South Carolina, National Security Fellow at the Truman National Security Project, and a Nonresident Senior Fellow at the King Faisal Center for Research and Islamic Studies. He previously served as a Senior Rule of Law Program Officer at the United States Institute of Peace and as a Professorial Lecturer of Islamic Law at the George Washington School of Law. Mr. Khan also served as Postdoctoral Fellow for Stanford Law School's Afghanistan Legal Education Project, and consulted on rule of law issues with a wide variety of international organizations, nongovernmental organizations, and U.S. Government agencies. He currently serves as a resident member of the World Justice Project's Rule of Law Consortium on Islamic law. He is a former adjunct professor of Islamic law at the University of Colorado Law School and former visiting professor of Islamic Studies at the University of Wyoming. He received his bachelor of science, summa cum laude, from the University of Wyoming and his doctorate of law from the University of Michigan Law School.